GETTING THE MOST FROM YOUR DUFFEL TOTE AND MARKET TOTES

- There are many variables that can affect the length of time food or beverages will stay cold. These include the ambient air temperature, the temperature of the contents at the time of packing, the volume of contents packed, and the amount and/or type of ice or ice packs used.
- The totes may be used with or without an ice pack or ice substitute; however an ice pack or ice substitute will extend the amount of time food stays cold or frozen.
- Ice packs or ice substitutes with a lower freezing point are preferable because they minimize the amount of condensation that can occur on the bottom of your tote (i.e. dampness that is caused by cold air from the tote meeting the hotter ambient air). Ice packs or ice substitutes can also focus the cold better than loose ice cubes.
- The fuller your totes are with food, the longer the contents will stay cold. In performance tests, a tote that was fully packed produced optimal results.
- The colder the contents are when placed inside the tote, the longer cold will be retained.
- As warm air rises and cool air falls, place ice, ice packs or ice substitutes on top of contents for best cooling results.
- When traveling you may substitute ice cubes in resealable plastic bags for ice packs/ice substitutes.
